

An aerial photograph of a meticulously landscaped garden. A winding path made of reddish-brown bricks leads through the space. To the right, a small, dark pond is bordered by large, smooth rocks. The garden is filled with a variety of plants, including several large, rounded evergreen shrubs, smaller flowering plants, and a mix of green and blue-toned foliage. The overall design is dense and layered, maximizing the use of the limited area.

Making the Most of a Limited Area

Looking Inward

With no views out from this property, the focus was turned inward. Tall pittosporum hedges frame the symmetrical garden, planned to be viewed from the main house level a floor above. Columns of nasturtiums rise from containers along the hedges, and a path of precast concrete squares leads to a garden-wide bench. Design: Chris Jacobson.
